The professionals involved in the planning, design, financial support, construction, and operation of a project, have their own particular view with regard to the construction management of the project.

Knowledge, once expertly compiled, can be very helpful, especially in large projects since it provides an opportunity for professional experts to present valuable services. Nevertheless, it is of utmost importance to understand how the different elements of a process are put together for excellent functioning. Wasting time and resources, extra human costs, and undue delays represent nothing but poor coordination and insufficient communication among the experts involved in the project. The main project owners, i.e., employers and project executives, would like to avoid such problems.
